

Air Force Weather Agency

The Air Force Weather Agency traces its lineage to the Army Air Corps Weather Service. The Army Air Corps organized this service within the Weather Section of the Office of the Chief of the Army Air Corps on July 1, 1937, when the Air Corps assumed responsibility for weather services from the U. S. Army Signal Corps. Oversight of the Air Corps Weather Service remained at the headquarters through the establishment of Headquarters, Army Air Forces, in 1941 and continued into the early years of World War II. On March 29, 1943, the Air Staff transferred administration of the Army Air Corps Weather Service to the headquarters of the newly created Flight Control Command.

The official lineage of the Air Force Weather Agency began on April 14, 1943, with the activation of the Weather Wing of the Flight Control Command. On May 3, 1943, the headquarters of the Weather Wing relocated from Washington, District of Columbia, to Asheville, North Carolina. However, on July 6, 1943, Army Air Forces returned control of weather services to the Air Staff, and on July 1, 1945, the Army Air Forces redesignated the Weather Wing as Army Air Forces Weather Service.

On January 7, 1946, the headquarters of the Army Air Forces Weather Service moved from Asheville, North Carolina, to Langley Field, Virginia. Soon thereafter, on March 13, 1946, Army Air Forces redesignated the organization the Air Weather Service and re-subordinated the service to the Air Transport Command. Along with the Air Transport Command, the Air Weather Service headquarters relocated to Gravelly Point, Virginia, on June 14, 1946.

On June 1, 1948, Air Weather Service was transferred to the Air Force's newly established Military Air Transport Service (which was redesignated Military Airlift Command on January 1, 1966). Headquarters, Air Weather Service, moved concurrently with Military Air Transport Service, to Andrews Air Force Base, Maryland, on December 1, 1948.

Air Weather Service headquarters moved with Military Air Transport Service to Scott Air Force Base, Illinois, on June 23, 1958, where it remained for more than three decades. On April 1, 1991, the Air Force designated Air Weather Service a field operating agency of Headquarters, United States Air Force. With this change Air Weather Service divested itself of nearly all its subordinate organizations. The Air Force redesignated Air Weather Service as the Air Force Weather Agency on October 15, 1997. Concurrent with this, Headquarters, Air Force Weather Agency, moved to Offutt Air Force Base, Nebraska.
